Crime scenes: I'll see your bail review and raise you $150,000

Judge grants defendant right to be heard, then raises bail

October 23, 2010 | By Peter Hermann, The Baltimore Sun

In an interview Thursday, Chiapparelli said he couldn't recall Campbell, but he did say that if a defendant insists on talking during a bail review, "then I read the file more. As they talk, I read the file, and there may be something in the file that outrages me more. I'm looking more closely at the facts in the case."

The judge said that on Thursday he reduced bail he had set for a defendant earlier after his lawyer proved that the defendant was no longer on probation. He told me he sees no reason to make any changes to the way the process works.

"I think the law is appropriate as it stands," Chiapparelli said.

But University of Maryland law professor Doug Colbert, whose students led the charge that prompted Nance's ruling, said a defense attorney for Campbell would've argued on his behalf and demanded an explanation from the judge for upping the bail. Defense counsel, Colbert said, is "the greatest check we have on judicial discretion."
